1 A sea monster known as a physetera or spouter, a type of whale, attacking a ship by vomiting water on it, from a map in the 1538 edition of Solinus, who describes just this type of attack by sea monsters (52.42). From C. Julii Solini Polyhistor ... Huic Pomponii Melæ de situ orbis libros ... adiunximus (Basel, 1538), between pp. 150 and 151 (British Library, 216.b.1).

2 A whale eating a ship off the coast of Norway, on Olaus Magnus's Carta marina of 1539; compare figs. 67 and 71 from the same map (from the edition of 1572, Stockholm, Sveriges nationalbibliotek, shellmark KoB 1 ab).

Whales attacking a ship on Olaus Magnus's 'Carta marina'; the sailors jettison barrels and a man on the ship plays a trumpet in order to scare the monsters away.

from an email to Marco Giovenale

i have come to think of asemia as a goal of sorts, perhaps akin to john cage's quieting of the mind.
we can move in that direction, but if we are in fact working with something we can accurately call writing, then we will never be able to attain the state of a fully quiet mind. success so to speak will always be a matter of degree. that seems well worth the work to me. the writing itself will never be strictly speaking asemic. it will always participate in the universally human context of pansemia. i think it is of some value to acknowledge that.

for me, in my experience of it, asemic writing is a subset of the very large category of visual writing (visual poetry is another form of visual writing). by visual writing i mean, simply, writing in which the visual characteristics of writing are foregrounded.

i came to asemic writing by way of poetry. for me, asemic writing will always be a kind of poetry.

please bear in mind that i am intentionally underscoring the subjectivity of these statements. i am not interested in defining asemic writing. i am willing to describe my experience of it.
